Some few thoughts about the idea coming to expression

When does the idea reveal it's potential? Maybe it's when things go wrong that you see what the idea was capable of. I find it quite interesting, how down through history, various artists have said to themselves: "Damn, I did it the wrong way. I'll have to do it again!" And then in second or third attempt the idea suddenly comes to it's right.

I talked to a colleague the other day about this and suggested we make a book or printed matter with the title '101 Fuck ups'. This book/printed matter should involve a handful of artists and consist of a discussion about the subject improvement - and subsequently show 101 works that got improved. The only problem would be that such a matter would be so self referring and self conceited that it probably only would be interesting for the artists involved. Another way of exploring the matter of potentiality is of course to let the idea simultaneously take off from different media. You see this more and more often - especially on the younger art scene. It is an obvious choice in a contemporary art world where crossover tendencies, both in regard to knowledge fields and media, are common place.

Around Christmas time Johanne Løgstup went on holiday to NYC. When she came back she told me that the Danish Consulate General had offered her the possibility of an exhibition in the Elisabeth Foundation of Arts studios. She asked whether I was interested. After she had described the place I suggested an exhibition concept where each artist let his or her idea find expression in four or more media. We discussed this for some time before deciding on this concept - and subsequently deciding on who else to invite.

Exhibition concepts are a tricky thing. On one hand they might lead the artist away from the kind of work he or she most successfully handle. If this is the case you are not far from a situation where the artist adopts a 'pretended role'. That makes the dialogue between the participating artists very complex. Let me try and explain this the following way: If A has a football and clones himself into A and A1 - and A1 passes on the ball, but it is only other clones that can receive the ball, unless it is A1's own original (that is A), then the receiver B, also has to clone himself into B and B1. Then it is B1 that returns the ball (after B has touched it) to A1, who finally passes it forward to A. In regard to the exchange of thoughts I see some strange perspectives concerning the question of authenticity.

Now on the other hand, the exhibition concept might 'force' the artist, in a simple way, into actions that reveal virgin territory. This off course depends of how firm or loose a grip the concept has on the final art. It is a delicate balance. If we simplify a great deal you might say that the concept is to tight when it becomes an 'über' concept - at least too tight to involve more than one artist. The way I see it, you want the concept to have the status of a pre-work - and not an actual work. As a pre-work the concept offers a common fundament from which the discussions of aesthetics can take place. In other words, it is another way of opening up the whole discussion of sensus communis - if that's what you want.

The title of this exhibition is inspired from a world as far away from Kant as possible - it is actually inspired by standard marketing. Here the term Line Extension is used to describe a products extension: Classic Coke, Cherry Coke, Diet Coke and so forth. The word 'Line' disappeared and 'Extensions' was on it's way...
